COURSE ANTH 204 — Survey of Pre-Collapse Civilisations
ASSESSING FACULTY Professor Leslie Thompson, Senior Fellow in Archaeological Theory
MARKING RUBRIC
CRITERION	REMARKS	MARK
Breadth of Subject Knowledge	Demonstrates a notably wide reading for a second-year student. References several primary texts not on the course syllabus.	20 / 20
Analytical Argument & Conviction	Arguments are frequently undermined by the student's own qualifications. The analysis beneath the hedging is often sound.	9 / 20
Field Identification Accuracy	Correct identification of three of four artifact samples. The fourth assessment was abandoned mid-paragraph with no conclusion reached.	11 / 20
Written Presentation & Structure	Legible and organised. Work is structured clearly and easy to follow.	16 / 20
FACULTY COMMENTS
Miss Lugrathe's enthusiasm for this subject is not in question — she engages more actively in seminar discussion than almost any student at her level, and her supplementary reading is, frankly, impressive. In conversation she can speak at length and with evident feeling about pre-Silence material culture; it is clear she cares about this discipline deeply. What is in question is whether enthusiasm alone will carry her through the rigours of a career in this field. The work submitted for this assessment does not reflect the student I observe in the seminar room. It is tentative where it should be declarative, apologetic where it should be confident. Archaeology is not a discipline that rewards self-doubt. I must also address Miss Lugrathe's repeated attempts to redirect seminar discussion toward the question of reversing the Silence. While I appreciate that this is a matter of personal significance to many students, it is not a subject that belongs in an academic setting. The Silence is not a puzzle awaiting an archaeological solution — it is a fact of our world, and responsible scholarship requires us to work within that reality rather than chase speculation. Miss Lugrathe would do well to redirect this energy toward her actual coursework, where it is sorely needed.
